Call to Order. The meeting of the Committee was called to order at approximately 10:30 a.m.

Approval of Minutes. The Minutes of the meeting of the Committee held in August, 2006, in Palm Beach were approved as presented without correction or amendment.

Preliminary Discussion. The Committee Roster was circulated and updated and the members introduced themselves. The Chair announced that the next committee meeting would be held in February 2007 on Hutchison Island in connection with the executive council meeting.

Sponsor: The Chair thanked US Trust Company of Florida for sponsoring the Committee's meetings.

2007 Trust and Estate Symposium. The Chair noted that it will be held in May, 2007 in connection with the Section's annual convention.

Arbitration Clause in a Will or Trust. The Committee's recommended draft legislation was noted as an action item for the Executive Council.

Exculpation Clauses in Wills. The Committee's recommended draft legislation was noted as an action item for the Executive Council.

Attorneys' Fees in Breach of Trust Action. Subcommittee members: Peter Sachs, Tom Karr, Harris Bonnettee, John Carr. The Committee extensively discussed and analyzed the subcommittee's White Paper and the proposed legislation. 17 members voted in favor of the legislation permitting payment of trustee's attorneys' fees in an action for breach of trust unless a beneficiary obtains an order prohibiting payment. 14 voted in favor of the draft legislation to require a trustee to obtain a court order before using trust assets to pay attorneys' fees in such an action. The Committee then ironed out the favored draft legislation and 16 voted in favor of final language and 12 opposed it.

Appealability of Orders in Probate. Subcommittee members: Tom Karr, Peter Sachs, Shane Kelley. The Chair urged the subcommittee to have the initial draft of its White Paper for the Hutchison Island meeting in February, 2007.

Time limit for seeking attorneys' fees and costs after final order in probate and trust proceedings. Angela Adams, Eric Virgil, Laura Sundberg.

Collateral attack on validity of a marriage based upon undue influence. Deferred. William Hennessey III, Laura Sundberg, Larry Miller, Russ Snyder and Christopher Winter.

New business: No jury trial in action for breach of trust. Shane Kelley and Laura Sundberg were appointed to this subcommittee to begin research and analysis of the issue.

Next Committee Meeting. The Chair announced that the next meeting of the Committee would be held on Hutchison Island in February, 2007 in connection with the next Executive Council meeting.

Section 2. This act shall take effect July 1, 2006.

Proposed 2007 House Bill

Section 731.401 Arbitration of disputes—

733.620 Exculpation of personal representative.--

(1) A term of a will relieving a personal representative of liability to a beneficiary for breach of fiduciary duty is unenforceable to the extent that the term:

(a) Relieves the personal representative of liability for breach of fiduciary duty committed in bad faith or with reckless indifference to the purposes of the will or the interests of interested persons; or

(b) Was inserted into the will as the result of an abuse by the personal representative of a fiduciary or confidential relationship with the testator.

(2) An exculpatory term drafted or caused to be drafted by the personal representative is invalid as an abuse of a fiduciary or confidential relationship unless:

(a) The personal representative proves that the exculpatory term is fair under the circumstances.

ITEM 4

PAYMENT OF ATTORNEYS' FEES FROM TRUST WHEN TRUSTEE IS ACCUSED OF BREACH OF TRUST

PROPOSED STATUTE PASSED BY COMMITTEE AND TO BE CONSIDERED BY PROBATE DIVISION AND EC

Section 736.0802 (10)

(10) Payment of costs or attorneys' fees incurred in a trust proceeding from the assets of the trust may be made by the trustee without the approval of any person and without court authorization, except as provided in subsection (a).

(a) If a claim or defense based upon a breach of trust is made against a trustee in a trust proceeding, a party must obtain a court order to prohibit the trustee from paying costs or attorneys' fees from trust assets.

(1) To obtain an order prohibiting payment of costs or attorneys' fees from trust assets, a party must make a reasonable showing by evidence in the record or proffer that provides a reasonable basis for a court to conclude that there has been a breach of trust. The trustee may proffer evidence to rebut the evidence submitted by a party.

- (b) Nothing in this subsection is intended to restrict the remedies a court may employ to remedy a breach of trust, including but not limited to ordering appropriate refunds.

RPPTL Probate and Trust Litigation Committee
Trustee's Attorneys' Fees Subcommittee
White Paper

1. Introduction.

Trustees of express trusts who find themselves involved in litigation face the issue of whether they can use trust assets to pay their litigation attorneys' fees and costs. Trustees can become involved in litigation for many reasons.

In some instances the trustees are joined as defendants because they are interested or necessary parties but no relief is sought against them. Such cases would include construction actions. Trustees often file such actions as plaintiffs. Suits can also be filed naming trustees as defendants in which the trustees are not accused of any wrongdoing, but the requested relief will affect the defendant trustees. Such cases would include those where a beneficiary seeks to set aside a trust in which the acting trustee has been named, and the beneficiary seeks to have administered in its stead an earlier document in which the currently serving trustee is not named. Into a third category fall those in which the serving trustees are accused of wrongdoing either in the procurement of the administered document or in the administration itself.

For purposes of this paper, the first category of actions will be referred to as "trustee neutral" cases; the second category will be referred to as "trustee affected" cases; and the third category will be referred to as "trustee liability" cases. This paper will address the "trustee liability" cases.

2. Shriner v. Dyer and the Current Law.

Florida law currently provides that the trustee is empowered to retain agents, including attorneys, and to pay them for their services. See § 737.402(2)(y), Fla. Stat. (2005). Logic dictates that in trustee neutral cases it is appropriate and expected for the trustee to use trust funds to pay trustee's counsel to prosecute or defend such cases as this would appear to be part of the administration process. Even if no relief were sought against the trustee initially, however, a party could amend at some point during the litigation proceedings to seek relief against the trustee. Alternatively, a co-defendant could assert a cross-claim against a trustee, converting a trustee neutral or trustee affected case into a trustee liability case. One might justifiably object to a trustee using trust funds to defend itself in a case where it is ultimately found to have improperly assumed the position of trustee, or the trustee is ultimately found to be liable for wrongdoing in the procurement or administration of the trust. One might also be troubled, however, by a legitimate, properly performing trustee being barred from using trust funds to defend the trust or itself in a trustee affected or trustee liability case that proves to be baseless.

Shriner v. Dyer, 462 So. 2d 1122 (Fla. 4th DCA 1984), is the one Florida case providing some guidance on the issue of a trustee's ability to use trust funds to defend itself in litigation. Unfortunately, this case raises more questions than it answers.

In Shriner, co-trustees reimbursed themselves from trust funds for their attorneys' fees incurred in a previous action in which they were sued solely in their individual capacities. The appellate court found that the co-trustees' "personal interests conflicted with their position as Trustees," citing § 737.403(2), Fla. Stat. (1983). That statutory section provides that when "the duty of the trustee and his individual interest... conflict in the exercise of a trust power, the power may be exercised only by court authorization...". The court held that the co-trustees should have obtained court approval before exercising their power as trustees to use trust funds to pay their attorneys' fees. The court stated:

Therefore, we hold that the unilateral payment of attorney's fees without court approval constitutes an improper payment out of trust funds.

The holding in this case arguably requires a trustee to obtain court authorization before paying attorneys' fees in any case in which the trustee is named as a party. Prior to 2005, there was no guidance in Florida statutes or case law as to when a conflict of interest arises that would require prior court approval, nor was there any guidance concerning the nature of the court approval that a trustee must obtain.

In recognition of the problem facing fiduciaries, the Florida Bankers Association proposed an amendment to § 737.403(2), which was adopted by the Florida Legislature in 2005. Section 737.403(2)(e), Fla. Stat. (2005), provides that court authorization is not required for:

(e) Payment of costs or attorney's fees incurred in any trust proceeding from the assets of the trust unless an action has been filed or defense asserted against the trustee based upon a breach of trust. Court authorization is not required if the action or defense is later withdrawn or dismissed by the party that is alleging a breach of trust or resolved without a determination by the court that the trustee has committed a breach of trust.

While this amendment addresses the trustee neutral cases, it does not explicitly address the appropriate handling of a case that begins as a trustee neutral case and becomes a trustee affected or, arguably, a trustee liability case. Nonetheless, this section frees the trustee to pay its attorneys' fees from the trust in those cases in which it has, throughout the proceeding, no conflict of interest.

The Shriner court analyzed the issue of payment of litigation fees and costs in terms of conflict of interest. In a trustee neutral case, no affirmative relief is sought against the fiduciary, so the trustee should have no conflict of interest as a consequence of the initiation of the litigation. With the enactment of § 737.403(2)(e), a Shriner analysis is unnecessary in trustee neutral cases. Arguably, a conflict of interest could arise in the trustee affected lawsuit since the outcome could result in the fiduciary losing its position, as in a trust invalidation proceeding, or the trustee's compensation could be reduced, such as in a case where one seeks to have assets excluded from the trust thereby decreasing the trustee's percentage compensation. A clear conflict of interest exists, of course, in the third category of trustee liability cases as the court could enter a money judgment directly against the trustee.

The authors performed a survey of the law across the country and found no case citing Shriner for the proposition that payment of attorneys' fees from trust funds without prior court approval is improper. They were also unable to find any case with a holding similar to Shriner. As might be expected based on the dearth of Shriner type cases, the authors found no case that proposed a solution generally to the problem facing a trustee regarding the source of funds for litigation attorneys' fees and costs. Generally, however, the case law appears to presume that the trustee will initially pay its attorneys' fees and be able to seek reimbursement upon its successful defense of alleged wrongdoing.

The Uniform Trust Code ("UTC"), which has been adopted by a number of states throughout the country, appears to presume that the trustee will advance its own funds in connection with litigation. UTC § 709 addresses "reimbursement" of the trustee from trust property. The comment to § 709 states, in pertinent part, Reimbursement under this section may include attorneys' fees and expenses incurred by the trustee in defending an action. However, a trustee is not ordinarily entitled to attorneys' fees and expenses if it is determined that the trustee breached the trust.

UTC § 709 (2000).

In its version of the UTC, the state of Utah added a subsection addressing litigation expenses. This subsection appears, however, only to elaborate on the basis for entitlement to reimbursement rather than the appropriateness of initially paying the fees from the trust. It reads:

If a trustee defends or prosecutes any proceeding in good faith, whether successful or not, the trustee is entitled to receive from the trust the necessary expenses and disbursements, including reasonable attorneys' fees, incurred.

U.C.A. 75-7-1004 (2004).

The Restatement 3d Trusts, § 88 (Tentative Draft No. 4), addresses the trustee's right of indemnification and directs payment from the trust of certain trust expenses. This section, like the cases found in the authors' survey, assumes that the trustee initially will pay the expenses incurred in lawsuits or in anticipation of litigation involving allegations of breach of trust. With respect to such cases, this section of the Restatement speaks only to indemnification.

The two sections that follow set forth the competing arguments for and against requiring a trustee to first seek judicial authorization before utilizing trust assets to pay litigation defense fees and costs. For analytical purposes, the focus of the following sections is on trustee liability cases because the authors concluded that this threshold issue must first be determined in that context before attempting to apply the analysis to the more subtle and more difficult question of trustee affected cases.

Within each of the following two sections is a suggestion for the procedure to be utilized in seeking the court's decision (whether the decision be on a petition to authorize or a petition to prohibit). The procedures are intended to be parallel, but complimentary of and consistent with each section's thesis i.e., whether the trustee should be required initially to seek judicial authorization to use trust funds to pay litigation defense fees and costs.

3. The Case for Prohibiting Trustee Access to Trust Funds to Pay Defense Costs.

A trustee sued for breach of fiduciary duty is just like any other litigant defending itself. Under the American Rule, parties to litigation bear their own attorneys' fees and costs during litigation and, unless one party prevails and demonstrates a legal basis for recovering fees from the other side (i.e., pursuant to contract or statute), neither party recovers attorneys' fees from the other. See Frymer v. Brettschneider, 710 So. 2d 10 (Fla. 4th DCA 1998). Accordingly, a trustee accused of breach of fiduciary duty in a legal proceeding should not pay its attorneys' fees and litigation costs incurred defending itself out of trust assets unless and until the trustee first obtains court authorization.

Under § 737.403(2), Fla. Stat. (2005), trustees presently enjoy a favored position among litigants in the Florida judicial system because they have the right to seek authorization to pay their attorneys' fees and costs out of the trust assets during the litigation. No other litigants enjoy this luxury. In contrast to judicial proceedings involving matters of trust administration, no compelling reason exists for favoring trustees over other litigants by allowing a trustee to use the assets in a trust to fund the trustee's personal litigation defense.

Legislation was needed in Florida due to Shriner v. Dyer, 462 So. 2d 1122, (Fla. 4th DCA 1984). Shriner is a unique case, decided on fairly specific facts, and, although it appears to attempt to articulate the historical common law rule, it applies the rule in an illogical and arguably unfair way. The current version of § 737.403(2), Fla. Stat. (2005) clarifies and/or corrects Shriner. Specifically, the statute makes it clear that upon the successful conclusion of litigation (i.e., by settlement or dismissal), the trustee is entitled to be reimbursed out of the trust. In the absence of statutory guidance, whether it is in the form of the current version of § 737.403(2) or in the form of new legislation, the Shriner case would remain the rule in Florida and perpetuate uncertainty among practitioners and courts.

It is, in fact, a conflict of interest for a fiduciary to use trust assets to defend itself against allegations of breach of fiduciary duty. The heightened responsibility a fiduciary owes to the trust and its beneficiaries does not end when litigation begins. More specifically, the fact of litigation does not alter the fiduciary's fundamental duty to avoid conflicts of interest. Indeed, other conflicts of interest that arise in the course of a trust administration are not tolerated and almost always give rise to liability if maintained without express authorization in the trust, the informed consent of the beneficiaries, or court permission. The underlying basis for many claims of breach of fiduciary duty is that the trustee has misused or misappropriated trust assets. Therefore, litigation often directly calls into question the trustee's prior use of those very resources the trustee now wishes to utilize to defend itself. The conflict of interest inherent in allowing a fiduciary to pay its legal defense costs out of the trust assets should remain impermissible unless approved by the court.

Another favored position trustees already enjoy over ordinary litigants is the availability of a ready source of funds (i.e., the trust corpus), for payment of the fiduciary's attorneys' fees in the event the fiduciary prevails in the litigation. Moreover, if the fiduciary is awarded attorneys' fees against the beneficiary, but the beneficiary is insolvent, often the fiduciary will still be entitled to reimburse itself out of the assets of the trust. In contrast, a successful litigant in traditional civil litigation faces not only the difficulty of establishing a right to prevailing party attorneys' fees, but also the inevitable challenge in enforcing an attorneys' fee judgment. In Florida, expansive protections for debtor's rights make collectibility a significant problem in many cases.

For the same reasons, if a trustee is allowed to utilize trust funds free from scrutiny by the court, there is a substantial risk that once an individual trustee is found to have breached its fiduciary duty, those trust funds utilized to fund the unsuccessful defense may never be recoverable by the prevailing beneficiary or repaid to the trust. Of course, this is more a problem for individual fiduciaries than for most corporate trustees. At the same time, however, concerns with the requirement that a fiduciary must first seek court approval seem focused more on the individual fiduciary since corporate fiduciaries can more often afford to fund their own litigation defense if required to do so.

Whether due to the fact of a corporate fiduciary's individual resources, access to information about the trust, or the availability of trust funds at the end of the case to reimburse the fiduciary for litigation expenses, the reality is that a trustee has a distinct advantage in litigation over beneficiaries. Therefore, there is no justification for allowing a fiduciary to engage in a conflict of interest without supervision from the court.

The assumption that the settlor was justified in trusting the fiduciary and, therefore, the fiduciary should be unconstrained in looking to trust funds to defend itself against allegations of breach, is often unwarranted. Many cases involve the settlor's chosen fiduciary engaging in wrongful conduct, including some cases where the fiduciary's role in the drafting of the very document in question or the fiduciary's appointment in the first instance are called into question.

Trust funds are special funds, unique in nature, if for no other reason than the fact that they have been earmarked by the settlor for a specific purpose (i.e., for the use and beneficial enjoyment of the beneficiaries). The trustee's service is at the whim of the settlor and it is intended to be focused on the proper management of the trust funds for the beneficiaries. Regardless of what the settlor of a trust may have stated in the trust instrument regarding a trustee's right to use trust funds or resources to pay expenses, it cannot be assumed that a settlor would have approved of or intended that his trustee would use the money set aside in trust for the beneficiaries to defend the trustee against the beneficiaries' allegations of breach of fiduciary duty. Settlor's who have this specific intent should be required to clearly state it in the governing instrument. In turn, that evidence of intent should be both admissible and persuasive (although not conclusive) to the court in its consideration of a trustee's petition for authorization to pay litigation expenses out of the trust.

The current version of § 737.403(2) correctly places the burden on the fiduciary to seek court authorization before paying its attorneys' fees and litigation costs out of the trust. Detailed guidance on standards the court should apply and the procedures that ought to be utilized in a specific case may be unnecessary. By definition, each situation should be judged on its own facts and each petition for authorization should be assessed on its own merits. Among other things, courts would logically consider the relative resources of the beneficiary, the trustee, and the trust itself. Courts should also consider the relative merits of the parties' positions as they appear on the record at that time, and the breadth of the powers granted to the trustee under the trust, including exculpatory language.

Courts should consider relevant extrinsic evidence. Compare § 737.403(1), Fla. Stat. (2005) ("In exercising its discretion to order a modification of a trust under this section, the court shall consider the terms and purposes of the trust, the facts and circumstances surrounding the creation of the trust, and extrinsic evidence relevant to the proposed modification."). One potential enhancement to the current version of § 737.403(2) would be the addition of express authorization to the court to consider relevant extrinsic evidence in the same manner as permitted under § 737.403(1). Finally, courts should be free to impose additional conditions (such as a bond) in connection with authorization to pay the fiduciary's defense costs out of the trust.

There is no evidence, anecdotal or otherwise, that suggests competent fiduciaries are declining to serve in light of the requirements of § 737.403(2). Indeed, it is generally recognized by many practitioners and most professional fiduciaries that a trustee should not use trust funds for breach of fiduciary duty litigation defense costs. Since there is no documented shortage of willing trustees over the course of several hundred years of experience with trusts and this common practice, there is no reason to believe a shortage will suddenly appear if the essence of the rule is maintained in § 737.403(2).

The Uniform Trust Codes recently adopted in North Carolina and South Carolina do not have express provisions on this issue. Similarly, Florida's draft version of the Uniform Trust Code does not appear to have any comparable provision. The draft Restatement of the Law Third Trusts appears to assume trustees will initially pay for their own defense in litigation involving allegations of breach. See Tentative Draft No. 4 § 88. Finally, nationwide research conducted by this subcommittee suggests that courts generally assume that trustees are not permitted to pay their litigation defense costs out of the assets of the trust prior to prevailing or without judicial authorization.

Finally, the prohibition against the trustee on using trust funds to pay for attorneys' fees and costs is not intended to be inflexible and unalterable over the entire course of a litigated matter. Rather, as the current statute provides, the trustee should be permitted the opportunity to obtain court approval for using trust funds for its defense costs.

a. Procedure for Obtaining Court Approval

Notwithstanding the policy reasons for requiring a trustee to use personal funds to defend litigation in which a breach of trust is alleged, a serving trustee should not be prohibited in every case from using trust funds as he or she deems fit to defend possibly proper conduct. See e.g. Ball v. Mills, 376 So. 2d 1174, 1181-1182 (Fla. 1st DCA 1979). In most cases, mechanisms are available to the court to protect both the trustee and the beneficiaries in the event a trustee is ultimately determined not to be liable for a breach of fiduciary duty. The court could, for example, prohibit the payment of distributions to beneficiaries or commissions to trustees pending the resolution of the litigation to preserve a fund for use in reimbursing the trust. See § 737.201, Fla. Stat. (2005). Nevertheless, due to the potential validity of the trustee's defenses, a safeguard should be put in place that allows the court, in appropriate cases, to authorize a trustee's access to trust funds to defend a breach of trust claim.

As noted above, under current law court authorization must be obtained before costs and attorneys' fees can be paid out of trust assets when breach of trust is alleged in litigation. See § 737.403(2)(e). Although the burden on the trustee to seek authorization may be implied, the current statutory mechanism does not specify who must seek court authorization before these expenses can be paid, and it does not give the court guidance on what standard it should apply in determining whether to authorize payment of these expenses out of trust assets.

One possible safeguard is a procedure borrowed from that which must be employed by plaintiffs to plead and recover punitive damages. Pursuant to § 768.72, Fla. Stat. (2005), a claim for punitive damages is not permitted until there has been a reasonable showing by evidence in the record or proffer by the plaintiff that would provide a basis for recovery of punitive damages. Such evidence can include correspondence, depositions, and affidavits. See, Int'l Ship Repair & Marine Servs., Inc. v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 944 F. Supp. 886, 895, 897 (M.D. Fla. 1996). Once the court is satisfied that the proffer of evidence is sufficient to establish a punitive damage claim, the plaintiff may then amend its pleadings to raise the claim. In this procedure, the defendant is not permitted to offer evidence to mitigate the claim. In fact, no formal evidentiary hearing is necessary. See Solis v. Calvo, 689 So. 2d 366, 369 n. 2 (Fla. 3d DCA 1997).

A similar procedure should be employed in breach of trust cases. If a trustee in such a case believes it is entitled to use trust funds to pay its defense costs, the trustee can file an appropriate pleading seeking to permit such access. Attached to the pleading would be the evidence that supports the trustee's defenses to the claim of breach, as well as other evidence that it was the settlor's intent or is otherwise appropriate for the court to permit the trustee to pay its defense costs with trust assets. In addition, discovery could be employed by the trustee to generate additional evidence to support the trustee's defenses. As long as the proffered evidence is sufficient to establish to the court a reasonable basis for the claim that no breach of trust was committed by the trustee, or other equitable grounds for allowing the trustee to use trust funds, the court would then consider permitting the trustee to pay its attorneys' fees and costs from the trust.

Unlike the punitive damage claim procedure, however, the procedure employed for breach of trust cases would permit the beneficiary to present evidence countering the trustee's claims, such as evidence tending to disprove the trustee's explanation of transactions or showing a counter-explanation to the trustee's explanation of its conduct. Additionally, the court could consider such factors as the value of assets in the trust, the trustee's entitlement to commissions or distributions and any applicable trust provisions, such as exculpatory clauses or language specifically addressing a trustee's access to trust assets for payment of expenses. By permitting the court to consider all relevant factors and authorizing the court to exercise its discretion to establish appropriate safeguards, the procedure enables the court to retain the discretion in appropriate cases to prevent unfairly burdening an honest trustee with the upfront payment of defense costs in the event of a finding of no breach, as well as making all parties whole in the event of an eventual finding of breach of trust.

This procedure would also clarify that the trustee has the burden of initiating an action to obtain court authorization prior to paying its attorneys' fees out of the trust in breach of trust actions. While avoiding the situation where a trustee has unfettered access to trust funds to defend improper conduct, this procedure would also serve as a safeguard against meritless claims of breach of trust. Only where sufficient evidence is presented by the trustee will it be permitted to use trust funds to defend against a breach of trust claim.

The proposed procedure strikes the best balance between avoiding the frustration of a settlor's intent by forcing out an innocent trustee chosen by the settlor and giving a dishonest trustee free access to the trust's assets. By permitting the court to weigh the evidence presented, the court is given the opportunity to make a reasoned decision rather than being forced into a harsh result notwithstanding the unique facts of a case. Also, as additional facts come to light during discovery, a trustee who is unsuccessful in securing an order permitting it to use trust assets to pay fees can make one or more subsequent requests to the court seeking access to trust assets. Conversely, a beneficiary who is unsuccessful in defeating a trustee's application for use of trust funds to defend itself can ask the court to revisit the matter as additional facts come to light.

4. The Case for Permitting Trustee Access to Trust Funds to Pay Defense Costs.

A person's access to the courts is a right that has long been cherished in American and Florida jurisprudence. Fla. Const. Art. 1, § 21; Flood v. State, 95 Fla. 1003 (Fla. 1928). In order to gain access to the courts in Florida, a person needs to do little more than record his or her grievances and pay a filing fee. The abolishment of technical forms of pleading (see Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.110) and the general liberality in granting plaintiffs leave to amend their pleadings (see Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.190) ensure that a plaintiff's case will not be dismissed with prejudice absent the rare inability to plead sufficient ultimate facts to state a cause of action. Often, a plaintiff will not be required to produce evidence in support of a complaint's allegations for months or years. During that period, the defendant, whether guilty or innocent of wrongdoing, must invest time and money defending the lawsuit.

Prospective and active litigants in lawsuits involving allegations of a trustee's breach of fiduciary duty are faced with these same realities of civil litigation. Additionally, due to the emotion that is often woven throughout trust litigation cases, rational evaluation of the risks and rewards of the litigation can be clouded. The potential to recover attorneys' fees pursuant to statute in trust litigation cases, which is often not present in other civil litigation cases, adds another element that can lead to more protracted lawsuits involving claims of breach of trust than one might find in other cases in the civil arena where a plaintiff is complaining about the conduct of another. See §§ 737.2035 and 737.627 Fla. Stat. (2005). In other words, cases involving a trustee's breach of fiduciary duty can be expensive and lengthy because it is easy to get into court, a litigant does not have to present proof of its claim at the outset, litigants are frequently driven by emotion, and litigants are encouraged to proceed with their cases when they learn of the possibility that the prevailing party can recover its attorneys' fees from the losing party.

Pursuing and defending lawsuits is an expensive proposition for all parties. It is important that people have free access to our courts to address grievances. This ease with which a frustrated beneficiary can sue a trustee for breach of trust, however, can give a prospective trustee good reason to pause before agreeing to serve. It also gives a serving trustee reason to be concerned over the cost of defense regardless of wrongdoing.

A plaintiff in any civil litigation is faced with paying for legal representation whether it be on a flat fee, contingency fee or hourly rate fee basis. A defendant is likewise faced with paying for legal costs. There are, however, many good reasons why a trustee who is a defendant in a lawsuit should be able to pay its legal costs from the trust's assets rather than its own assets unless and until the plaintiff can establish at some level that the claim against the trustee has merit.

The most important duty of a trustee is to carry out the intentions of the settlor of the trust. One of the important expressions of a settlor's intent is his or her choice for trustee. The selection of the trustee, especially when it is an individual, can be central to the settlor's entire plan as the settlor may perceive that only a select group of individuals has the necessary judgment, knowledge of family history and relationship to the beneficiaries to serve effectively. Exposing this prospective trustee to the possibility of significant personal expense if he or she is wrongly sued for breach of fiduciary duty could discourage that trustee from serving. This, in turn, frustrates the settlor's intentions.

Often a settlor is cognizant of the difficulties the trustee will have in dealing with certain beneficiaries but feels the chosen trustee is the proper person to handle the job. Forcing the trustee to personally absorb litigation expenses could serve only to reward the very beneficiaries with whom the settlor was concerned. The settlor may have additional reasons for selecting persons or institutions as trustees. Those reasons could be a desire to confer a benefit on the trustee, such as compensation, or to preclude the service of others, such as unrelated third parties or difficult family members. A common situation is where a settlor appoints a spouse to succeed the settlor upon his or her death. Often we see a second or third spouse appointed to administer a trust that ultimately benefits children from a settlor's prior marriage. It would frustrate the settlor's intention if the surviving spouse refrains from serving for fear of financial strain under the weight of prospective trust litigation.

It is also after a trustee accepts the position of fiduciary that the prospect of unforeseen litigation can serve to frustrate the settlor's intentions. A trustee that finds himself or herself in litigation, even for wrongs not committed, may choose to resign rather than incur the personal expense of litigation. In the event the trustee chooses to fight the litigation, the strain on the trustee's personal resources may affect his or her judgment thereby placing that trustee in a conflict of interest. For example, an aggressive defense may serve the interests of the beneficiaries, but a trustee that is paying for litigation expenses from his or her own funds may be reluctant or unable to take a more aggressive tack. Indeed, a non-institutional trustee may have very little personal resources to pay the attorneys' fees necessary to defend against even a baseless charge of breach of fiduciary duty.

A reasonable contrary position is that a trustee should be treated no differently than any other defendant regarding defense costs, and, further, the trustee may have committed wrongdoing as alleged in the plaintiff's complaint. The allegations of wrongdoing should not, however, be taken at face value in light of the settlor's clear expression of intent regarding the selection of the trustee. Situations also arise where the settlor is not deceased and is serving as the trustee. In those cases, of course, there is no less compelling reason to defer to the settlor's intent regarding his or her selection of trustee.

Procedure for Obtaining Court Order Prohibiting Trustee Access.

Notwithstanding the policy reasons for permitting a trustee to use trust funds to defend litigation in which a breach of trust is alleged, a serving trustee should not be given a blank check to use trust funds as he or she deems fit to defend possibly improper conduct. In most cases, however, mechanisms are available to the court to protect the beneficiaries in the event a trustee is ultimately determined to be liable for a breach of fiduciary duty. The court could, for example, prohibit the payment of distributions to beneficiaries or commissions to trustees pending the resolution of the litigation to preserve a fund for use in reimbursing the trust. See § 737.201, Fla. Stat. (2005). Nevertheless, because of the potential validity of the plaintiff's claims, a safeguard should be put in place that allows the court, in the appropriate case, to prohibit a trustee's access to trust funds to defend a breach of trust claim.

Under the current law, court authorization apparently must be obtained before costs and attorneys' fees can be paid out of trust assets when breach of trust is alleged in litigation. See § 737.403(2)(e). Although the burden on the trustee to seek authorization may be implied, the current statutory mechanism does not specify who must seek court authorization before these expenses can be paid, and it does not give the court guidance on what standard it should apply in determining whether to authorize payment of these expenses out of trust assets. The current statutory mechanism, however, does not clearly specify who must seek court authorization before these expenses can be paid, and it does not give the court guidance on what standard it should apply in determining whether to authorize payment of these expenses out of trust assets.

One possible safeguard for these issues is a procedure borrowed from that which must be employed by plaintiffs to recover punitive damages. Pursuant to § 768.72, Fla. Stat. (2005), a claim for punitive damages is not permitted until there has been a reasonable showing by evidence in the record or proffered by the plaintiff which would provide a basis for recovery of punitive damages. Such evidence can include correspondence, depositions, and affidavits.

Once the court is satisfied that the proffer of evidence is sufficient to establish a punitive damage claim, the plaintiff may then amend its pleadings to raise the claim. In this procedure, the defendant is not permitted to offer evidence to mitigate the claim. In fact, no formal evidentiary hearing is necessary. See Int'l Ship Repair & Marine Servs., Inc. v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 944 F. Supp. 886, 895, 897 (M.D. Fla. 1996); and Solis v. Calvo, 689 So. 2d 366, 369 n. 2 (Fla. 3d DCA 1997).

A similar procedure should be employed in breach of trust cases. If a beneficiary in such a case believes there was a breach of trust, the beneficiary can file an appropriate pleading to prohibit the trustee from paying attorneys' fees and costs with trust assets. Attached to the pleading would be the evidence that led the beneficiary to believe there was a breach. In addition, discovery could be employed by the beneficiary to generate additional evidence to support the claim. As long as the proffered evidence is sufficient to establish to the court a reasonable basis for the claim that a breach of trust was committed by the trustee, the court may then consider prohibiting the trustee from paying its attorneys' fees and costs from the trust.

Unlike the punitive damage claim procedure, however, the procedure employed for breach of trust cases would permit the trustee to present mitigating evidence, such as a clarification of misunderstood transactions or a reasonable explanation for seemingly improper conduct. Additionally, the court could consider such factors as the amount of assets in the trust, the trustee's entitlement to commissions or distributions and any applicable trust provisions, such as exculpatory clauses or language specifically addressing a trustee's access to trust assets for payment of expenses. By permitting the court to consider all relevant factors and retain discretion to establish appropriate safeguards, the procedure enables the court to retain the ability to make all parties whole in the event of an eventual finding of breach of trust.

This procedure would also clarify that the beneficiary who raises the breach of trust issue has the burden of initiating an action to prohibit a trustee from paying its attorneys' fees in breach of trust actions. This procedure would also serve as a safeguard against meritless claims of breach of trust. Only where sufficient evidence is presented by the beneficiary will the trustee be prohibited from using trust funds to defend against a breach of trust claim.

The proposed procedure strikes the best balance between avoiding the frustration of a settlor's intent by forcing out an innocent trustee chosen by the settlor and giving a dishonest trustee free access to the trust's assets. By permitting the court to weigh the evidence presented, the court is given the opportunity to make a reasoned decision rather than being forced into a harsh result notwithstanding the unique facts of a case. Also, as additional facts come to light during discovery, a plaintiff who is unsuccessful in securing an order prohibiting a trustee from using trust assets to pay fees can make one or more subsequent requests to the court seeking to limit a trustee's access to trust assets. Conversely, a trustee who is initially prohibited from using trust funds can ask the court to revisit the matter as additional facts come to light.

5. Conclusion.

The subcommittee recognizes that, in a trustee liability case, policy reasons exist for both initially prohibiting and initially permitting a trustee to have access to trust assets to pay trustee attorneys' fees and costs. While the subcommittee takes no position on which of the two approaches reflects the best policy, the subcommittee unanimously recommends adoption of a procedure akin to that set forth in § 768.72, Fla. Stat. (2005) relating to punitive damages.

The subcommittee believes that legislation rather than a rules amendment would be most appropriate, given that this is a substantive issue which should be addressed by the legislature.

The subcommittee considered and rejected the proposal that nothing should be done and the issue of trustee access to trust assets for attorneys' fees and costs be left to the courts.

ACTEC ARBITRATION TASK FORCE DRAFT PAPER

INTRODUCTION

There is no substitute for the certainty and self-determination resulting from a settlement of a dispute between parties. Much has been written about mediation as a tool for helping litigants settle their differences. There are many success stories that bolster the credibility of that process. But, some cases just cannot get resolved in that manner. And, many disputes that do get settled are resolved after the parties have gone to great expense in navigating the shoals of judicial process. Our task is to study the litigation that does not settle or settles late in the litigation and see if we can develop a more efficient process for deciding those cases.¹

In developing a method for deciding (rather than settling) disputes outside the traditional judicial process, we must speak of "arbitration." The word "arbitration" simply means the act of resolving a dispute by a person appointed by the parties or given authority by a statute or otherwise. The word “arbitrator” simply means a person with the power to decide a dispute. Webster’s New Collegiate Dictionary (9th Edition). These seemingly simple, innocent words, we have learned, conjure up images of a three-headed tribunal deciding commercial disputes in an unfair and oftentimes bureaucratic fashion, more steeped in process than the traditional judicial process. The form of trial resolution we believe may prove useful in our practice requires that we refer to “arbitration,” because the law concerning the authority to resolve disputes without a traditional judge comes from cases involving arbitrations. Our hope is that the reader can see past the blinding prejudice “arbitration” evokes.

As estate planners and lawyers for fiduciaries administering estates and trusts, we are ever cognizant that one of our clients’ goals and one of our biggest challenges is to save taxes and other expenses where feasible. Our clients want us to maximize the amount of assets passing to the intended beneficiaries. One of the largest expenses incurred by estates, trusts and beneficiaries is the costs and fees associated with litigation, not to mention the beneficiaries’ loss of time to enjoy the assets.

Our collective wisdom tells us that administering a will or trust will run more efficiently and at less cost if we could resolve disputes arising in those proceedings through the use of a non-traditional form of trial resolution involving a trial resolution judge with extensive experience in, and knowledge of, our field of practice. Justice is often mired in procedure, hyper technical evidentiary rules, ignorant finders of fact and law, and unmanageable judicial calendars. If we could only bring common sense and legal expertise to our specialized disputes, we might get to justice more efficiently. Further, we might be able to keep these proceedings private.

There may be other compelling reasons to consider a non-traditional form of trial resolution. For example, Professor Gary Spitko makes the case for using arbitration clauses in wills and trusts to combat the prejudices of majoritarian cultural norms on the wishes of a non-conforming testator or settlor. See Gone But Not Conforming: Protecting The Abhorrent Testator From Majoritarian Cultural Norms Through Minority-Culture Arbitration, 49 Case W. Res. L. Rev. 275 (1999). While the professor’s thesis involves somewhat exotic examples, it need not. Developing an estate plan for a person who, for whatever reason, is considered controversial within a community fits within the professor’s theory.²

Although private trial resolution or “arbitration” clauses were at one time eschewed by the courts as denying access to the “only true arbiters of legal dispute and due process,” the pendulum has moved far to the other pole. Now, these clauses are upheld by our courts whenever possible. See Circuit City Stores Inc. v. Adams, 121 S. Ct. 1302, 1318 (U.S. 2001) (“Times have changed. Judges in the 19th century disfavored private arbitration. The 1925 Act was intended to overcome that attitude, but a number of this Court’s cases decided in the last several decades have pushed the pendulum far beyond a neutral attitude and endorsed a policy that strongly favors private arbitration.”).³ Further, each state in these United States and the District of Columbia has codified a form of binding arbitration into its statutes. Most states have patterned their law after the Uniform Arbitration Act.

What is now a choice to agree to arbitrate or to require arbitration may become a practical necessity. To have this vision one need only look to one’s own jurisdiction and the yearly budget disputes between governors and legislatures as they make difficult spending choices. The “third branch of government” is not an uncommon target. Within that debate, social and political considerations mandate that our leaders use their limited resources to fund criminal, juvenile, and family justice long before they reach estates and trusts. As judicial resources dwindle or shift to a more pressing use, it is apodictic that already slothful judicial resolutions of trust and estate litigation will slow even further. In jurisdictions with competent, up to date jurists, you will see the constant outsourcing of trials to retired judges and magistrates with more time on their hands. And, of course, the competent, up to date jurist, will eventually retire.

Arbitration or non-traditional trial resolution, per se, does not solve these concerns. Indeed, it can be as cumbersome a process as a traditional judicial proceeding, if not more so. We endeavor here to offer our colleagues a more efficient form of dispute resolution that specifically meets the needs of our trust and estate clients and that works in tandem with the mediation process.

² Note, however, that the prejudice, if it appears, may come out in a will or trust contest. If that contest takes the form of an attack on the validity of the whole will or trust, including the arbitration clause (e.g. testamentary capacity), then the matter will be heard by the court, not the arbitrator whose very power is at issue. See Prima Paint Corp. v. Flood & Conklin Manufacturing Co., 388 U.S. 395, 403-04, 87 S.Ct. 1801 (1967). On the other hand, if the arbitration clause is attacked as being the product of fraud or undue influence, then arbitration under an otherwise appropriate clause may remain extant. Id. This point may offer a strategy issue for the contestant: should I bring a partial contest if my capacity case is weak (as most are) and thereby preserve arbitration?

³ The practitioner should keep this change in policy in mind when reading the turn of the century cases on arbitration clauses in wills.

LEGAL UNDERPINNINGS OF ARBITRATION

Arbitrating trust and estate disputes is not prohibited in most states.⁴ In most states, nothing prohibits two or more persons with a trust or estate dispute from agreeing to resolve their dispute through arbitration. See, for example, Uniform Arbitration Act (2000) §6; A.R.S. §12-1501; Cal. C.C.P. §1281; §44.104, Fla. Stat.⁵

Less obvious is whether arbitration can be mandated by a testator or settlor in a will or trust in a way that is enforceable. The answer appears to be “yes.” See ADR in the Trusts and Estates Context, 21 ACTEC Notes (Fall 1995) 170; The Use of Arbitration in Wills and Trusts, 17 ACTEC Notes 177 (1991). This answer seems imbedded in testamentary intent, contract theory, conditional transfers of property, or some combination of them.

Testamentary and settlor intent are typically used by planners to create a form of arbitration they may not even recognize as such. We commonly give a fiduciary “sole discretion” to decide between competing requests for principal invasions, to decide what is income or principal, to decide whether a trust is no longer revocable by the settlor,⁶ and the like. The decision of the fiduciary can be attacked only on limited grounds such as arbitrariness, conflict of interest, and bad faith⁷—which happen to be the same limited grounds, in most jurisdictions, for appealing the decision of an arbitrator.⁸

Contract theory seems to lack viability with respect to wills and most trusts. Whether a trust is a “contract” is debatable in some jurisdictions and clearly not the case in others. See Schoneberger v. Oelze, 96 P.3d 1078 (Az. Ct. App. 2004) (A trust is not a contract); Estate of Washburn, 581 S.E.2d 148, 152 (N.C. Ct. App. 2003) (referring to “trust agreement or other contract”); Robsham v. Lattuca, 797 N.E.2d 502 (table), 2003 WL 22399541 (Mass. App. Ct. 2003) (unpublished) (trust is not a contract). Less controversial is the conditional transfer, which subsumes the intent of the testator/settlor and appears more firmly entrenched throughout our jurisdictions. See Tennant v. Satterfield, 216 S.E.2d 229, 232 (W. Va. 1975) (“The general rule with regard to acceptance of benefits under a will is that a beneficiary who accepts such benefits is bound to adopt the whole contents of that will and is estopped to challenge its validity. ... Acceptance of a beneficial legacy or transfer is presumed, but the presumption is rebuttable by express rejection of the benefits of by acts inconsistent with acceptance. Without acceptance by the intended transferee, the transfer does not occur. ...”); Wait v. Huntington, 1873 WL 1382 (Conn. 1873) (A beneficiary takes only by benevolence of the testator, who may attach lawful conditions to the receipt of the gift.); American Cancer Soc., St. Louis Division v. Hammerstein, 631 S.W.2d 858, 864 (Mo. App. 1981) (beneficiary takes only by the benevolence of the testator, who may attach lawful conditions to the receipt of the gift). However, in addition to other tax issues, conditional gifts to a surviving spouse may create a “terminable interest” that runs afoul of the marital deduction.

All of these underpinnings, in our opinion, lack a level of certainty that most planners and clients would consider desirable. We could bring certainty to the issue by a statute allowing a testator or settlor to require by will or trust that issues involving the estate or trust administration be decided by an arbiter, rather than a court. This may be problematic with respect to third parties such as creditors, if they are indispensable parties. But, we see no bar to legislative action that would assist in binding trustees and beneficiaries. And, because the statute is merely codifying the common law, theoretically it could apply to documents already in existence.

⁶ This type of provision may be suspect. In re Revocation of Revocable Trust of Fellman, 604 A.2d 263 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1992) (arbitration of settlor’s competency violated public policy).

⁷ See 3 Scott on Trusts §§187, 187.2; Steele v. Kelley, 46 Mass. App. Ct. 712, 734 (1999).

⁸ See In re Hirshorn’s Estate, 209 P. 2d 543 (Co. 1949) (en banc); Old Nat’l Bank & Trust Co. of Spokane v. Hughes, 134 P. 2d 63 (Wa. 1943); Howe v. Sands, 194 So. 798 (Fla. 1940) (en banc); U.A.A. (2000) §23.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF ARBITRATION IN WILLS AND TRUSTS

The practical issue involving constitutional analysis is whether the matter under scrutiny has a favorable history and is engrained in our public policy.

Arbitration, with rare exceptions, has become an integral part of conflict resolution. Testators and settlors have used arbitration clauses in their wills and trusts for centuries and courts have upheld them, even if provisions imposing binding arbitration upon the disputing parties barred their access to the courts. See Pray v. Belt, 26 U.S. 670, 679-80 (1828) (upholding a clause that empowered a majority of the executors to decide all disputes arising under the will); Wait v. Huntington, 40 Conn. 9 (1873) (court upheld testator's power to condition devise with following provision: "Should any questions arise as to the meaning of this instrument, I direct that the distribution of my estate shall be made to such persons and associations as my executors shall determine to be my intended legatees and devisees, and their construction of my will shall be binding on all parties interested"). See also The Use of Arbitration in Wills and Trusts, 21 ACTEC NOTES 177 (1991) (citing F. Kellor, American Arbitration 6-8 (1948)). Indeed, many practitioners routinely (if not unwittingly) include what are effectively arbitration clauses in wills and trusts. Examples include provisions directing the executor to resolve disputes arising in the division of tangible personal property or conferring the power to determine a settlor's capacity. The legal basis for this form of involuntary, binding arbitration stems from the legal basis for the testamentary disposition of property in general.

Since arbitration, in the abstract, is neither illegal nor contrary to public policy, courts have had little difficulty upholding testamentary arbitration clauses. Early courts did so by drawing analogies to contract law. They generally recited that agreements to arbitrate future disputes are enforceable and reasoned that, although a will is not a contract, parties who accept property under a will impliedly agree to be bound by all of its terms. See American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions v. Ferry, 15 Fed. 696 (1883). Other courts arrived at the same conclusion on the basis of agency law, reasoning that if the testator has the power to designate the objects of her bounty, she may also designate an arbitrator as her agent to make necessary determinations for her. See Talladega College v. Callanan, 197 N.W. 635, 637-38 (Iowa 1924); Howe v. Sands, 194 So. 798, 800 (Fla. 1940).

While arbitration itself is not contrary to public policy, some states have concluded that it contravenes public policy in certain trust and estate contexts. For example, New York courts have held that the distribution of a decedent's estate may not be submitted to arbitration. See Swislocki v. Spiewak, 273 A.D. 768 (N.Y. App. Div. 1947); Matter of Kabinoff, 163 N.Y.S. 2d 798, 799 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 1957); In re Will of Jacobitz, 295 N.Y.S.2d 527, 529 (1968).⁹ In Pennsylvania, an otherwise valid arbitration clause in a revocable trust was not honored where the issue to be arbitrated was the competency of the settlor of a revocable trust. In re Fellman, 412 Pa. Super. 577, 604 A. 2d 263 (1992). The Pennsylvania Superior Court ruled that, "as a matter of public policy, issues of incompetency cannot be submitted to arbitration."¹⁰ Similarly, in Michigan, the sole authority to pass on the testamentary capacity of a testator is vested by statute in the probate court and cannot be conferred on an executor, even by consent of the parties to the dispute. Meredith's Estate, 275 Mich. 278, 291 (1936).¹¹

Of course a constitutional issue does not arise if there is no "state action." With very limited exceptions, our state and federal constitutions exist to protect the individual from his or her government. If the government has no involvement in a transaction, no constitutional issue is implicated. For example, in NCAA v. Tarkanian, 488 U.S. 179, 191 (1988), the Supreme Court stated: “Embedded in our Fourteenth Amendment¹² jurisprudence is a dichotomy between state action, which is subject to scrutiny under the Amendment’s Due Process Clause, and private conduct, against which the Amendment affords no shield, no matter how unfair that conduct may be.” For these reasons, if the arbitration is purely a matter of agreement between parties or a condition of a gift, the lack of any “state action” should preclude the implication of a state or federal constitutional question. See Davis v. Prudential Securities, 59 F. 3d 1186, 1190-91 (11th Cir. 1995) (Constitutional due process protections do not extend to private conduct abridging individual rights.).¹³

Assuming “state action” is present, constitutional attacks on arbitration have come from three concerns: a lack of “access to court,” “due process” And the right to a jury trial.

If adequate safeguards are in place to allow a prospective litigant effective vindication of his or her claim in the arbitral forum, that forum will generally suffice as an effective substitute for a judicial determination. See Gilmer v. Interstate/Johnson Lane Corp., 500 U.S. 20 (1991) (plaintiff raised “a host of challenges to the adequacy of arbitration procedures” which the Supreme Court rejected, noting that such suspicions of arbitration are “out of step”).

Any life remaining in the argument that arbitration denied “access to court” died with Circuit City Stores v. Adams, 121 S.Ct. 1302, 1313 (2001). The Supreme Court rejected the notion that a litigant would lose a substantive right because an arbitrator rather than a judge heard his or her plea. On the other hand, an arbitration agreement imposing procedural impediments or prohibitive cost requirements may be invalid because it denies access to an effective remedy. Green Tree Financial Corp.-Alabama v. Randolph, 531 U.S. 79, 92 (2000) (“Similarly, we believe that where, as here, a party seeks to invalidate an arbitration agreement on the ground that arbitration would be prohibitively expensive, that party bears the burden of showing the likelihood of incurring such costs... How detailed the showing of prohibitive expense must be before the party seeking arbitration must come forward with contrary evidence is a matter we need not discuss; for in this case neither during discovery nor when the case was presented on the merits was there any timely showing at all on the point.”); Bradford v. Rockwell Semiconductor Systems, Inc., 238 F.3d 549 (4th Cir. 2001) (fee-splitting provision in employment agreement requiring employee to share costs of arbitration can render a mandatory arbitration agreement unenforceable where the arbitration fees and costs are so prohibitive as to effectively deny the employee access to the arbitral forum).

Traditional rules of civil procedure might lull us into thinking that there is a due process right to discovery, but that is not correct. See Savage v. Commercial Union Insurance Company, 473 A.2d 1052, 1058 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1984) (“The right to discovery is one of these devices which is not obligatory as an essential of due process to a valid arbitration proceeding.”); Kropat v. Federal Aviation Administration, 162 F.3d 129, 132 (D.C. Cir. 1998) (formal, pre-trial discovery contemplated under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure is not required in arbitration proceedings). Due process merely requires fair notice and a fair opportunity to present one’s case. Mullane v. Central Hanover Bank & Trust Co., 339 U.S. 306, 314 (1950) (“Fundamental fairness generally ‘requires only ¹² “No State shall . . . deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law” U.S. Constitution, Amdt. 14, §1.

¹³What is “state action”? As noted in a footnote in Davis, “the term ‘state action’ is used generically here to mean government action.” Id. at 1191, fn. 5. “In the typical case raising a state-action issue, a private party has taken the decisive step that caused the harm to the plaintiff, and the question is whether the State was sufficiently involved to treat that decisive conduct as state action. This may occur if the State creates the legal framework governing the conduct . . . ; if it delegates its authority to the private actor . . . ; or sometimes if it knowingly accepts the benefit derived from unconstitutional behavior Thus, in the usual case we ask whether the State provided a mantle of authority that enhanced the power of the harm-causing individual actor The inquiry must be whether there is a sufficiently close nexus between the State and the challenged action of the regulated entity so that the action of the latter may be fairly treated as that of the State itself.” Id. (citations omitted).

notice, an opportunity to present relevant and material evidence and arguments to the arbitrators, and an absence of bias on the part of the arbitrators.’ Nationwide Mutual Insurance v. Home Insurance Company, 278 F.3d 621, 625 (6th Cir. 2002).’); See Mandl v. Bailey, 858 A.2d 508, 522 (Ct. Spec. App. 2004) (assuming fair notice and a genuine opportunity to be heard, virtually any procedural rules developed for an arbitration will satisfy due process requirements) Therefore, effective trust or estate arbitration must include a mechanism for providing notice and an opportunity to be heard. As we stress elsewhere in this report, notice and an opportunity to be heard should be given to minors, unborn and unascertained persons through their proper representatives.¹⁴

Finally, the right to a jury trial may be waived through a clearly established agreement to arbitrate. From the agreement, courts will infer that the waiver occurred. See Marsh v. First USA Bank, N.A., 103 F.Supp.2d 909, 921 (N.D.Tex.2000) (valid arbitration provision waiving the right to resolve a dispute through litigation in a judicial forum, implicitly waives the attendant right to a jury trial). As mentioned in the introduction to this report, whether a party to an agreement can waive a non-party’s right to a jury depends on the jurisdiction addressing the issue. See Merrill Lynch Pierce Fenner & Smith v. Eddings, 838 S.W.2d 874, 878-79 (Ct. App. 1992) (beneficiaries bound by trustee’s agreement to arbitrate); In re Weekly Homes, L.P., 180 S.W.3d 127 (Tex. 2005) (beneficiaries bound by settlor’s agreement to arbitrate); Clark v. Clark, 57 P.3d 95, 99 (Okla. 2002) (beneficiary not bound by trustee’s agreement to arbitrate). Less certain is whether a testator or settlor can mandate waiver of a fiduciary’s or beneficiary’s right to a jury resolution of a probate or trust dispute as a condition of accepting the fiduciary appointment or devise under the will or trust. Assuming no state action, reason would dictate that arbitration as a condition to a devise and in lieu of a jury, might be permissible. In Gilmer v. Interstate/Johnson Lane Corp., 500 U.S. 20, 111 S.Ct. 1647, 114 L.Ed.2d 26 (1991), the Supreme Court upheld conditions to employment agreements requiring that an employee accept arbitration over the resolution of disputes by a jury.¹⁵

Even less certain is whether a state could impinge on a constitutional right to a jury (versus a mere statutory right to a jury). Because of this uncertainty, the Arbitration Task Force decided to protect the right to a jury trial in the Model Act.

TAX ASPECTS OF ARBITRATING WILL AND TRUST DISPUTES

The Task Force has concluded that decisions reached in a simplified trial resolution under the Model Act, with adherence to its carefully crafted procedures and process, should be extended the same deference as decisions of state trial courts in the determination of federal tax liabilities. Much analysis has already been given to the tax consequences of resolving will and trust disputes. For example, in a paper presented at the 2005 annual meeting of the College, Fellows Patricia Culler, Laird Lile and Donald Tescher observed that:

Trust and estate disputes are a burgeoning part of a trust and estate lawyer’s practice. In addition, trust instruments that were, perhaps, adequate when drawn become problematic as the decades pass, resulting in a need for construction, reformation or other modification to resolve both “friendly” and “unfriendly” disputes over the continued administration of the trust. However such problems arise, their solutions require a careful consideration of tax consequences. This is true whether the resolution will be by judicial determination or by settlement agreement.

Culler, Lile and Tescher, Uncle Sam: The Silent Party at Estate and Trust Dispute Settlements, 2005 ACTEC Annual Meeting, p. B-1 (hereafter referred to as “CLT”). See also Kovar, Adversity After Bosch, 28 ACTEC Journal 88 (2002); McCaffrey, Fix-Ups For Estate Planning Documents, 2002 ACTEC Annual Meeting.

The same analysis and policy concerns apply equally well to the resolution of trust and estate disputes by arbitration. While arbitration involves neither judicial determination nor voluntary settlement, in terms of systemic analysis it is closely akin to the process of judicial determination. The Model Act requires resolution by a neutral trial resolution judge, with simplified procedures for discovery, and with safeguards to ensure compliance with fundamental due process rights. The procedure is invoked by application to a state court, which appoints the trial resolution judge. The decision of the trial resolution judge is filed with the state court, which has the jurisdiction and authority to enter orders to enforce the decision. The decision of the trial resolution judge can be appealed to the appropriate state appellate court, although the scope of the appeal is limited when compared to appeal of a decision of a state trial court.

In summary, there is both sufficient state court involvement in the simplified trial resolution process, and systemic parallelism between that process and the resolution of disputes through litigation in state trial courts, to conclude that resolution of a dispute under the Model Act is entitled to the same deference - no more and no less - as resolution of that dispute by litigation in a trial court. Thus in the end, we are left on the familiar (if somewhat uncertain) ground of the holding of Commissioner v. Estate of Bosch, 387 U.S. 456 (1967).

Bosch specifically dealt with the effect of lower state court determinations involving the particular taxpayers (and events) which were the subject of the tax case before the Court. But Bosch probably also stands for the proposition that, absent a determination of the law by the highest court of the state in any other case as to a particular issue of law, the IRS will not be bound by any lower state court rulings in other cases on the issue.

¹⁴ Both the checklist for will and trust clauses and the Model Act included in this report provide for simplified trial resolution that is binding on minors, unborn and unascertained persons

CLT at p. B-5.

The same factors that determine whether the Internal Revenue Service gives deference to a trial court decision under state law or to a settlement of those disputes should apply equally to a simplified trial resolution under the Model Act.

In actual contested litigation such as a will contest, trust contest or a tort action such as intentional interference with inheritance, breach of fiduciary duty or the like, the parties are likely to be truly adversarial and any settlement likely to be the result of a "genuine and active contest." The existence of a true adversarial contest will be one helpful factor in determining whether desired tax results are achieved. . . .

A settlement may also occur in a court action that may be non-adversarial, or adversarial in theory only, such as a declaratory judgment, construction or reformation action. In these cases the "settlement" may take the form of an agreed judgment entry or merely consent by all the parties to the requested relief when the action is filed. With these types of settlements there are two concerns. First, even though there may be an actual "controversy" in the sense that there is an issue which requires resolution, the lack of true adversity may none the less cause the IRS to disregard the state court determination or the settlement. Second, the nature of the proceeding will affect the tax results. In the case of a declaratory judgment or construction action, the court's determination will speak as of the date the instrument took effect and thus is more likely to achieve the desired tax results. In the case of a reformation action or a settlement agreement under state law power allowing amendment by all beneficiaries and the trustee, there may be no retroactive effect. Under the completed transaction doctrine, it may not be possible to achieve certain taxable results if the taxable event has already occurred.

CLT at pp. B-6, 7 (footnotes omitted).

Informal discussions with a senior official in the Internal Revenue Service with responsibility for federal transfer taxes support the conclusion that the same deference (or lack thereof) for state trial court decisions will apply to decisions reached through simplified trial resolution under the Model Act. The Task Force discussed seeking a revenue ruling or procedure from the Service supporting this conclusion, but decided not to ask the College for authority to pursue this for several reasons. In those informal discussions with the senior official with the Internal Revenue Service it was apparent that the Service would not be eager to issue any rulings of a general nature in an area where the determination of federal tax liability is so completely dependent upon particular facts and circumstances of each case. In addition, it would be difficult for the Service to issue a ruling or procedure that could address the whole panoply of arbitration proceedings that might arise.

Finally, the theory underlying the analysis of Bosch and its progeny is so fundamentally sound and well established that it should be without question that the same analysis should apply to resolution of disputes under the Model Act. If the analysis of Bosch applies to settlements of trust and estate disputes (see CLT at p. 5), resolution of those same disputes in a simplified trial resolution under the Model Act should receive at least the same analysis and deference.

MODEL ACTS

In the "Legal Underpinnings" section of this report, we noted that bringing certainty to the enforceability of arbitration clauses in wills and trusts is laudable and can be done by statute. Below are two Model Acts. The first, short form, simply makes arbitration clauses in wills and trusts enforceable. It also provides a default dispute resolution process by incorporating existing law or the second, long form, Model Act below, which includes a complete default process for resolving disputes.

Whether your jurisdiction chooses the short form of Model Act or the longer form, the Task Force believes that having a default resolution process is critical. This is because a settlor or testator may simply direct that disputes be arbitrated, without any further direction or other indication of what he or she meant. Further, many estate planners lack the experience or inclination to develop provisions mandating a dispute resolution process for incorporation into a will or trust clause.

MODEL SIMPLIFIED TRIAL RESOLUTION ACT

1. Enforceability of Arbitration Clauses. Subject to subparagraph (a), a provision in a will or trust requiring the arbitration of disputes among beneficiaries, a fiduciary under the will or trust, or any combination of them, is enforceable.

(a) If the validity of the provision requiring arbitration is contested, the court shall resolve that issue prior to resolution of the balance of the dispute. If the arbitration provision is determined to be valid, the balance of the disputed issues will be resolved in accordance with the arbitration provision and the time for resolving those disputes shall toll pending final resolution of the validity of the arbitration provision.

(b) Unless otherwise specified in the will or trust, a will or trust provision requiring arbitration shall be presumed to require simplified trial resolution under this Act.

(c) Notwithstanding a valid arbitration provision, all persons interested in a dispute may agree to have their dispute resolved by the court rather than in accordance with the arbitration provision.

2. Arbitration by Agreement. Absent an arbitration provision in a will or trust, the persons interested in a dispute may agree in writing to submit a controversy to arbitration before or after an action has commenced. Unless otherwise specified in the agreement, the agreement shall be presumed to require simplified trial resolution under this Act.

3. Fiduciary liability. A fiduciary under a will or trust is not individually liable for agreeing to arbitrate, agreeing to have the court resolve an issue that would otherwise be resolved by arbitration, or any other agreement made in accordance with this Act.

4. Commencement of Simplified Trial Resolution. A Notice of Commencement of Simplified Trial Resolution shall be filed by one or more interested persons. When a Notice of Commencement of Simplified Trial Resolution is filed, fees paid to the clerk of court shall be paid in the same amount and manner as for complaints initiating civil actions. The clerk of the court shall handle and account for these matters as if they were civil actions, except the clerk of court shall keep separate the records of simplified trial resolution proceedings from other civil actions.

5. Jurisdiction and Venue. The court and clerk involved in the simplified trial resolution process shall be the same court and clerk that could be involved if the entire dispute were resolved through a judicial tribunal. By agreement of all interested persons and the simplified trial resolution judge, the simplified trial resolution hearings and dispute management conference may occur at a location outside the jurisdiction and venue of the court that would otherwise resolve the dispute; provided such an agreement will not change the jurisdiction and venue of any court proceedings related to the simplified trial resolution.

6. Tolling of Statutes of Limitation. The filing with the clerk of court of the Notice of Commencement of Simplified Trial Resolution will toll the running of any applicable statutes of limitation.

7. Content of Notice of Commencement and Objections. The Notice of Commencement of Simplified Trial Resolution shall concisely list the issue or issues in dispute and shall certify that all persons interested in the dispute were served by facsimile, email, or U.S. Mail (certified Return Receipt Requested) with the application. Proof of service of the notice of commencement shall be filed with the clerk of court. A responsive pleading, motion or objection, if any, may include appropriate objections, if any, to the dispute being resolved by simplified trial resolution. This Act shall not apply to any dispute which involves the rights of a person who is not a party to the simplified trial resolution when that person would be an indispensable party if the dispute were resolved in court.

8. Appointment of Simplified Trial Resolution Judge and Qualifications. If a will or trust provides for a method for appointing the simplified trial resolution judge, or if the interested persons have entered into an agreement which provides for a method for appointing the simplified trial resolution judge, the court shall proceed with the appointment as prescribed. In the absence of an agreement among the parties or provision in a will or trust, or if the agreement, will or trust provision regarding appointment fails or for any reason cannot be followed, the court, on application of a party, shall appoint a simplified trial resolution judge who is a lawyer with at least 10 years of practice in trust and estate law and has no interest or other involvement in the matter. Within 10 days after the filing of the Notice of Commencement of Simplified Trial Resolution, the court shall appoint the simplified trial resolution judge. Within five days after rendition of the order appointing the simplified trial resolution judge, the person who filed the notice of commencement shall serve an original or conformed copy of the signed order on all interested persons.

9. Setting Final Simplified Trial Resolution Hearing. Within 10 days after rendition of the order appointing the simplified trial resolution judge, the simplified trial resolution judge shall notify the interested persons of the time and place of the final hearing. The final hearing shall commence within 120 days after the date on which the order appointing the simplified trial resolution judge was rendered.

10. Discovery and Procedures for Final Arbitration Hearing.

(a) Discovery and hearing procedures shall be in accordance with an agreement of the parties or, if none, by rules established by the simplified trial resolution judge. The [your state Evidence Code or laws of evidence] shall apply generally to all proceedings under this section, except that affidavits and other means of reducing the cost of authenticating and explaining evidence may be used at the discretion of the simplified trial resolution judge. A record and transcript may be made of the arbitration hearing if requested by any party or at the direction of the simplified trial resolution judge. The record and transcript may be used in subsequent legal proceedings subject to the [Your state Rules of Evidence and Rules of Appellate Procedure].

(b) Within 15 days after service of the order appointing the simplified trial resolution judge and after notice to all interested persons, the simplified trial resolution judge shall conduct a dispute management conference. At the conference, the simplified trial resolution judge and the interested persons shall execute a written agreement setting forth the terms of the arbitration, discovery parameters and the process to be followed, including the trial resolution judge's compensation. To the extent the parties cannot agree to the terms of the simplified trial resolution, discovery parameters and the process to be followed, those matters shall be decided by the simplified trial resolution judge and included in a written order served on the interested persons. If the parties cannot agree on the simplified trial resolution judge's compensation, it shall be determined by the court after notice to all interested persons and an opportunity to be heard. Nothing in this subsection is intended to preclude subsequent dispute management conferences that the simplified trial resolution judge may wish to conduct, which may address any issue described in this subsection.

(c) The simplified trial resolution judge may administer oaths or affirmations and conduct the proceedings in accordance with the [rules of court or other promulgating authority]. The simplified trial resolution judge may issue subpoenas for the attendance of witnesses and for the production of books, records, documents, and other evidence. The simplified trial resolution judge may apply, or authorize an interested person to apply, to the court for orders compelling attendance and production. Subpoenas shall be served and shall be enforceable in the manner provided by law.

11. Final Decision and Appeal. The final decision shall be in writing, which shall include findings of fact and conclusions of law. The simplified trial resolution judge shall serve the parties with a copy of the decision within 10 days of the final adjournment of the simplified trial resolution proceeding. Within 10 days of service of the decision, the parties may serve on the other parties and the simplified trial resolution judge a list of corrections as to the form of the order, including clerical errors and mistakes in describing parties or property. There is no right to rehearing. Within 5 days following the period for offering corrections to the form of the decision, unless otherwise agreed to by the parties, the simplified trial resolution judge shall file the decision with the court. Upon the filing of the decision, the court shall enter a final judgment adopting the decision of the simplified trial resolution judge.¹⁶ Upon entry of final judgment by the [circuit court or other trial court], any party may appeal to the appropriate appellate court within 30 days after the final judgment is rendered. Factual findings determined in the simplified trial resolution are not subject to appeal. The harmless error doctrine shall apply in all appeals. An appeal of a simplified trial resolution decision shall be limited to review on the record and not de novo, of:

(a) Any material failure of the trial resolution judge to comply with the rules of procedure or evidence that apply to the arbitration by agreement, rule, or Act.

(b) Any partiality or misconduct by a trial resolution judge prejudicing the rights of any party.

(c) Whether the decision reaches a result contrary to the Constitution of the United States or of the State of [your state].

12. Virtual Representation. Decisions in simplified trial resolution proceedings shall be binding upon minors, unborn persons, and unascertained persons to the same extent as orders and judgments entered in judicial proceedings concerning estates and trusts.

13. Disqualification of Trial Resolution Judge. A simplified trial resolution judge may decline appointment or recuse himself or herself. Any party may petition the court to disqualify a simplified trial resolution judge for good cause. In the event the simplified trial resolution judge declines appointment, recuses himself or herself or is disqualified, the court shall appoint a successor simplified trial resolution judge in accordance with paragraph 8 of the Act. The time for simplified trial resolution shall be tolled during any periods in which a motion to disqualify or the appointment of a successor simplified trial resolution judge is pending.

14. Immunity. A simplified trial resolution judge appointed under this Act shall have judicial immunity in the same manner and to the same extent as a judge. All parties, attorneys, witnesses and other persons participating in the simplified trial resolution shall have immunity from libel and slander and other tortious conduct to the same extent as would be afforded them in a judicial proceeding.

15. Costs. Except as otherwise agreed by the parties, costs of the simplified trial resolution, including compensation of the simplified trial resolution judge and other expenses of the simplified trial resolution judge, directly related to the proceeding, including, among other things, the cost of the hearing room, if any, and the cost of the court reporter for the dispute management conference, shall be initially borne by the estate or trust, with the details of these costs and fees set forth in the written agreement between the trial resolution judge and parties, or, if none, the trial resolution judge's order, executed at the dispute management conference. A party shall initially bear his or her additional costs and expenses in connection with the simplified trial resolution, including, but not limited to, legal fees, witness expenses, and deposition and hearing transcripts. The trial resolution judge may order costs, including, but not limited to, reasonable attorneys' fees, expert witness fees, and deposition and hearing transcripts, to be paid by any party to the proceedings, individually or from a beneficial interest in the estate or trust before the trial resolution judge.

17. Jury Trial. Nothing in this law shall be construed as abrogating any person's constitutional right to a jury trial that he or she has not waived.¹⁷

¹⁶ Some jurisdictions may wish to adopt a more automatic process whereby the filing of the decision automatically makes it a final judgment of the court.

¹⁷ Paragraph 17 may have great significance in some jurisdictions and less in others where juries are rarely the trier of fact in a court proceeding. If your jurisdiction includes this provision, parties constitutionally entitled to have an issue resolved by a jury, who have not waived that right by agreement or otherwise, can still have the issue resolved by a jury, thereby avoiding the will or trust clause otherwise requiring arbitration.
